THIS IS UNEVALUATED INFORMATION

A six-engine or eight-engine plane with double rudder assembly was observed frequently over the eastern section of Moscow. It was always escorted by three or four fighters. The plane was noticeably large, had a very large wing span, and resembled in shape and size the German "Giant". It usually flew very high and very fast and was not one of the frequently seen four-engine planes. *

25X1 * Comment. The type of aircraft cannot be determined from this description. The plane is possibly one of the few Ju-290s with four engines, or a prototype of the Ju-390 with six engines, which was possibly made air-worthy by the Soviets.
